ACTIVITY AT THE B. & O. DEPOT.—
With the merry music of the locomotive sells and the deep bass rumble of the moving freight trains, the receiving, loading sind unloading of goods, the prompt leparture and arrival of passenger trains, and instead of the threatening crowds of did usen around the depot, the sight of and instead of the threatening crowds of idle men around the depot, the sight of every man quietly working at his post, a great sigh of relief goes up from the public heart. The blockade is broken, the paralysis of business ceases, and the currents of commerce resume their old channels, and all is order and life and hope once more. Indeed it looks as if for a long time at least these channels of or a long time at least these channels of trade would be filled fuller than their wont with the impeded currents, and that the immediate result at least would be a sort of general business revival.

More Than He Asked For.—It happened last week, but it is too rich to have lost its alsove yet. One of the most solid of Wheeling's solid men, after having read the accounts of the railroad riots, went home fairly bursting with righteous indignation. Pacing up and down his parlor floor he gave went to his outraged feelings. Being informed by the gentle voice of his honored spouse that a man was at the kitchen door waiting to see him, he hurried down, with an impetuosity born of passion. Before him stood a tramp. Solid man, "What do you want?" Tramp, "I want something to eat." Solid man, "What do you want?" Tramp, "I want something to eat." Solid man, "What do you want?" Astonished but full of hope, "I want some shoes." "Well, I have a pair of thick-soled boots!" And with this laconic answer he began to beat a taito on the tramp's body, the tramp at the same time beating a hasty retreat.
